The news of Smith's death came as a great surprise to his friends in this city. It was known that he was in the West, but he was thought to be resting after a hard season's work with a Kansas City stock in the sund of the surprise to his pricession. "Beau" Smith, as he was known about town and among theatrical folk, was one of a coterie all of whom claim St. Louis as their birthplace, and who have since become generally known as actors or play-wrights. Smith and Augustus Thomas were early associates. Others of this circle were: Della Fox, Will Smythe, Louis Carpenter, Erreil Dunbar and Guy Lindstey.

Nearly all of those mentioned were associated with Smith in the McCullough Club, an organization of amateur actors of this city, which flourished in the latter seventies and in the eighties. Smith was stage manager in this club, and directed nearly all the productions of the organization. It was in this capacity, his friends believe, that he acquired the intimate knowledge of the cause of the state the time of the Burnham-Hopkins suit.

YOUTHFUL COUPLE SOUGHT A LICENSE.

Disappointed at East St. Louis, They Were Equally Unsuccessful at Belleville.

Frank Oerth, 21, and Ada Reisinger, 15 Frank Oerth, 21, and Ada Reisinger, 15 years old, were the names and ages the couple gave at both the marriage license offices. Their addresses they gave as St. Louis. Both Deputy Caughlin at East St. Louis and Deputy Hilgard at Believille think the couple live in East St. Louis. Oerth, Mr. Hilgard says, is only about 15 years old. He guessed the age of the girl as about 14 years. Mr. Hilgard seldom if ever makes a mistake in guessing ages, especially of young folks, and when the couple asked him for a marriage license, he laughed, thinking at first that they were laughed, thinking at first that they were out on a lark and were joking. When the request was repeated, he looked serious and request was repeated, he looked serious and began questioning them. The young man said he had just passed the age of it, and the girl said she had her mother's consent to her marriage. Mr. Hilgard told them he could not issue the license unless the parents of both were present, and gave their consent. Tears weiled into the eyes of the couple and they confessed that Marriage License Clerk Caughlin at East St. Louis had also refused them a license. The names the young people gave cannot be found in the directories, and, although they said they lived in St. Louis, it is believed the names were assumed and that the couple came from East St. Louis.
